

I am against any implementation of a national standard that would diminish what we currently have through the Indiana Telephone Privacy List. What we have seems to work quite well. "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." I had an unlisted number but still got solicitations by phone (one of the biggest abusers was Ameritech, who was getting a monthly fee for my being an unlisted customer, by the way!). I can't remember an unwanted call since putting my name on the privacy list. Please do not adopt a national standard less than what we currently have in force in Indiana. What we have in force really does seem to be working. It's not mandatory a person enroll on the list, so those of us who do...well, we do not want to be bothered by telephone solicitors, telemarketers, etc., etc. I think we have our own rights by not having our privacy interrupted by unwanted callers.
